

London has best hospitals

We tend to take for granted so many things in life until we have a personal experience that brings home, clearly, just how fortunate we are.

In my mind, London has, without a doubt, some of the best health-care facilities in the world. All London hospitals are highly rated, but, because of recent surgery at University Hospital, I must rate it the best for the surgery I had Oct. 28.

My brain surgery was performed by Stephen Lownie, a neurosurgeon, assisted by a team of surgeons and technicians. In my case, Lownie dealt with two aneurysms that had to be clamped off at two different locations in my brain. Thanks to the skillful hands of Lownie, he saved my life and did so without any permanent impairments that are always a risk.

I also want to pay tribute to all the staff at University Hospital.

Londoners should remember they are most fortunate to live in a community that provides them with access to world-class hospital care, such as that provided by University Hospital.

RUTHE MANN
London

Letter to the Editor, London Free Press, January 9, 1995